NEW-ORLEANS:

SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 22, 1841.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Few Documents have been looked for with more anxiety than this first message of President TYLER. The partial uncertainty which existed as to his political views; the frequent hints of the opposition as to his non concurrence in the principles of the whig party; the assertion of his absolute hostility to several cardinal measures of Republican policy, had inspired intense solicitude in the minds of all, not unmingled it may be with some share of distrust. All this has been dissipated, annihilated by the message. It is every thing that the whigs can desire; every thing that locofocoism can detest. It is a plain, manly, sensible, independent, honest, republican state paper; clear and concise in style; open and frank in tone; elevated and dignified in feeling; pure and patriotic in principle. It will go through the depths and breadths of the land, making glad the hearts of the freemen by whose suffrages its author has attained exalted station.

The message opens with a touching allusion to the death of General HARRISON, and suggests the propriety of legislative intervention for the relief of his family, whose limited resources have been seriously embarrassed by heavy expenditures during the brief period of his administration.

The President glances at our foreign relations; they are, for the most part satisfactory. The difficulties with Great Britain, on the subject of the imprisonment of McLEOD, though yet unsettled, do not induce a belief that peace between the two nations will be interrupted.

In connexion with the census, which exhibits a population of over seventeen millions, Mr. TYLER adverts to the public domain, of which 770,000,000 millions, ceded and unceded, yet remain to be brought into market. There is nothing in the extension of our empire over our acknowledged possessions, to excite any alarm for the safety of our institutions. So long as the Federal and State Governments revolve in their proper orbits, the harmony and integrity of the Confederacy will continue unaffected.

The condition of the Treasury is unsatisfactory.—The actual and accruing revenue are insufficient to meet the demands upon the government for the ensuing year. It is estimated that the dificit will amount to $11,406,132 98. The aggregate amount of outstanding appropriations on the 4th of March last was $33,429,616 50, of which $24,210,000 will be required this year—besides $2,500,000 for the War Department. The available funds to meet this will not exceed $14,670,000. In order to supply this deficiency, the President suggests a revision of the Tariff, so as not to conflict with the Compromise Act of '33, object not to conflict with the Compromise Act of '33, object to conflict with the Compromise Act of '33, object to conflict with the Compromise Act of '33, object
