PARIS NAPOLÉON'S VICTORY IN THE CONFEDERACY.—The Washington correspondent of the "Times" says that Prince Napoleon and state returned from Paris.

The Prince was received by General Beauregard and Johnson, and invited them to go to the capital to see him.

General Beauregard informed the Prince that he had captured in New York a number of the Confederates.

Washington's speech to the world says that a six gun boat and the George Page went up the creek.

The United States' Special Agent reported that the British Government had sent a cablegram to Washington, advising him to withdraw his troops from the creek.

Calmness and Confidence.

Our governors of the South, with all their dastardly courage and baseless contempt in confronting danger and death, are singularly indifferent to the welfare of their country.

They were to be waging war upon all the world.

They were to be waging a brilliant engagement.

Honor and respect are antagonistic to their nature.

We saw a good deal of their previous to the second battle of Bull Run.

Confederate commanders had moved deliberately and steadily, and persisted in remaining on the defensive, the sages and intrepid spirits of the Southern chieftains at the moment.

It seems to us that they have done well, have advanced upon the enemy, and given him battle, and that Washington should have been incensed, if not taken. Every hour of leisure appeared so much of precious time lost.

The British Consul here states that the movement of naval vessels when McLellan's troops had advanced upon him, were not made with profound concern.

They were as greatly deceived by his forces, as we were by our own.

Lord Palmerston, the Foreign Minister, repented his single act of judgment.

But our foes as well as our friends were unfeigned.

BAUDREAU's strategy had calculated everything.

It feigned to be a surprise, and when the Federals advanced upon him, gave him battle, pell-mell.

He was beaten, and fled to the rear.
