LETTERS AND DIARY OF AN ITALIAN NOBLEMAN.
Number III,
WASHINGTON, January, 1831. WARRINGTON, January, 1831.

The Count: The melange which you meet withat the act of the President of the United States, on the 188 of mary, does not suit me. I witnessed some specticles are, which disguisted me with the Republican Court, and ist have been offensive to all who had the least notion of nement of manners. The refreshments were watched seized upon, as soon as they were brought out the re-tory, by some rude and ignorant men, who seem to have no there merely to eat, and every thing stripped from the year before the servants could advance a few paces. Every empt the servant made to pass them was marsiling, I sometimes their rough and commannetly efforts to ar-the confections, caused them to be thrown upon the er, with the destruction of the china and glass borne up-the trays. This may be republican manners, but they far from being such as any man with the least pretensto refinement could relish or tolerate, and were par-The principle of the pr carly obnoxious and oif make in the dwelling of the first tage trate of the nation. I am told that this promiscuous simblings, where the minister of state and the shoe-black—the maker of laws and the digger of dykes—the mover of the machinery of government and the mover of stones and dit—form a delightful padley; was not permitted unforther the administration of the street and the mover of stones.

which is usually given about nine, days before the party takes place, when you must expect a ferfect squeeze. The fushionable hour of attendance is from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $9 \text{ o'clock}, and the entertainment consists of conversation, les ecartes, music, or dancing. I received an invitation to goe of these concertation to go other aight. It was what they call here a jam—that is, an almost immovable mass, where you are obliged to stand in one place the whole evening, or if you make he moved by the crowd. This is assuredly u reomonlight to stand in one place the whole evening, or if you move, he moved by the crowd. This is assuredly uncomfortable; but every body seems to be joyous, animated and phased. Their conversation is without our gesticulation and without our compliment and poetry. Some retire to the card room and some anuse themselves in dancing, while the rest look on and converse, but the topics of conversation are seldom literary, and mostly confined to the curn at politics of the day. One sometimes seem a very great collection of beauty at these routes. The America's women is at a lithink, generally haddening but they wentled. and I think, generally handsome; but they want that fire, vivacity, and warm, ardent and passionate temperament when distinguish the females of ftally. They are reserved, modes, and sometimes cold, but atill lovely and fascinating. Their feet and ankles are small and beautiful, but their statue is more that of Minérva than Venue. The lady whose party I attended the other gentler, were a beautiful. Their fect and nukles are small and beautiful, but their statue is more that of Minérva than Venue. The lady whose party latended the other evening, was a brunette. Her complexion is that of Italy—her form delicate and elegant, and her manners easy and graceful. She resembles E—, without her touching melancholy, and her impassionate expression. While I gazed on her, I thought of that interesting being whose genius is not less splendid than her beauty. But they have no improvizatrices here; no Euphrosynes, or Corinas. Their language will not admit of it; an affir it did, the poetical temp runent, the fine pherency of poetical inspiration, the heated and glowing imagination are wanting. They converse sometimes fluently, but they

of poetical inspiration, the heated and glowing imagination are wanting. They converse sometimes fluently, but they have no poetry—their "thoughts do not breathe," nor their "words burn." Their conversation is rather sensible than hively, said their sentiments more the result of judgment than of feeling. Like most wondo they dance gracefully, and delight "in the poetry of motion;" and they sings and play con spiritu, and sometimes con amere. As wives they are devoted and tender, and suit themselves to the circumstances and condition of the husband when they enter into the matrimonial state. But it appears to me, my dear count, in the matrimonial state. But it appears to me, my dear count, that the style of living in Washington is not exactly compatible with the simplicity of republican manners. There is too much of display and extravagence about it, to company with the usual madriage of further according to the is too much of display and extravagance about it, to comport with the usual mediocrity of fortune, common to the citizens of this republic. This fondness for display, and lines habits of extravagant living often lead, as you may riporose to bankraptey and ruin. They are, however, determined to spend the dawn of life merrily, if its close is glormy and sorrowful. I am, on the whole, pleased with these sources—they are a relaxation after the tedium of the day, and one meets there the best seciety of the country, and cary spend an hour or two very assessibly in chatting to the my spoud an hour or two very agreeably in chatting to the dies, or talking politics with the cantlemen. There isdies, or talking polities with the gantlemen. There assembles, on these occasions, a great variety of characters, from the high polish of the Frenchman to the unpretended and native dignity of the Indian. The man of fashion and the statesman—the orator and poet—the legislator and man of business—the cultivation of the soil and man of letters, all commingle together in one undistinguishable mass, interchange opinions, discuss politics, and separate to meet again assessment other rout or party.
