A private note from this point, dated Friday evening (20th) last, gives no latest information direct. The enemy nontrook to take possession of the opposite side of the river on Thursday, but after whells from our batteries quickly drove them away. They had got a singe gran in position outher weet side, three and a baif niles below us, and were throwing a rhell into our lines occasionally, without, however, doing any, damage. The fiset lay in full view, nearly four miles below. Deserters from the forces on both sides were constantly coming in, and telling the same tale of demoralization. From Ponchatenia.

The following is the latest intellig ouchatouls, from the Appeal of netant: Our intelligence from Ponchatoula is ver Our intelligence from Ponchatonia is very meager, sid not so cheering as we would-like to report. There is nothing in it, however, to justify the disheartening runours after in the city in the least. The extent of the rail by the Yankeen, so well as the result to this Obniderates, has been exagérated beyond precedent. Our forces, at that point was very small—a mere guard in jumbers, who of course fell back on the advance of a greatly superior body of the enemy.
