CHANGE MAKES CHANGE.

The National Intelligencer having been charged with sneaking, seeks to vindicate itself from the charge by showing that its views are not peculiar to itself, but are common to all. In other words, that it has always been opposed to the doctrine of secession. The Intelligencer fabricates its own premises, and then argues against them. It appears that it does not care to oppose the policy of the Administration in this we fail to recognize the able, temperate, peace-loving and judicious journal of former days. We remember the time—and that not so long ago—that the Intelligencer was habitually guided by the conduct of that print, so lofty was its reputation for wisdom, sagacity and experience, blended with a genuine standard of patriotism. The best that can be said of it is that it has not lost its connection with the Federal Government, it preserves its customary moderation of language. It is certainly willing that the South shall be wholly independent of Lincoln, but it would like to see the upper South without anger and without strife. We do not know but that such an enemy is more dangerous than the bold braggadocio and foul-smelling slender who are seeking to make the upper South their vocation. But your smooth spoken journalist, who clothes himself in airy and outward courtesy, while meditating a stab under the fib of that class which we may say, "the tiger," has done to us.

About this seeming consistency of opinion, this stolidity, which is considered an era, there is no room for argument. There is.

There is an old adage which declares that where man often changes his opinions—feels, never.

Proverbs usually embody a vast amount of common sense, and are especially suited to the character of ideas and action brought about by circumstances.

We are told, however, that all human progress would be impossible, and civilization would become torpid, if it did not change.

What is the upper South's view?

It is that it is a time when things are too dull to leave them alone.

One thousand people never to change their views.

The American Confederacy will be still in a condition of indecision, until Indian men, who continue a sedentary and peaceful life and free institutions would be as little known now as they were five centuries ago.

But the truth is, change is the very order of the day.

Whether the circumstances prove that the upper South is right, or that those who have called for change to be applicable, change is impetuously demanded.

The ruling streak of events, which those who have been most instrumental in creating the upper South's feeling of alarm and anxiety, will be held responsible for.
