NEW-ORLEANS. Tuesday Morning, July 12, 1831.

A robbery was committed the evening before last, in a store situated in Gravier street, belonging to Messrs. Tracy & Miller. A fowling piece, and a few pieces of cotton were stolen and after wards found in the New-Exchange street. The corner lamp which had been probably cut down by the knaves to light their way, was found in the store. Civilization, it seems, is of utility to all; and it can no longer be asserted that lamps

European intelligence of a few days later than that we published on Saturday last has been received by yesterday's mail. It came to New-York by the ship Colosens, which sailed from Londonderry on the 24th May. The London dates reach to the 20th, being only two days later. Of the continent there is not much news: the most important is the resumption of hostilities between Belgium and Holland.

Mr. John Ridge, an enlightened and highly grasp of the Sultan of Georgia. Washington with the delegation commissioned by the Cherokee government, informs us, in a letter addressed to the editor of the Phanix, that among four individuals arrested by the Georgian janizaries there is one. Mr. John West, a highly esteemed Cherokee, charged with the heinous crime of "having used insulting language towards the guards." Last evening, says Mr. Ridge, I saw these four individuals, chained and hand-enffed, escorted by the guard. The same circumstance is related in a letter from Mr. David Vanu, and confirmed by the National Jour, at of Washington. We cannot, indeed, but remark the striking resemblance of the police of Georgia to that of, Villèle and Polignan in France: and the fate of John West reminds us strikingly of that of the unfortunate Chauvet, who was linked to a convict and promenaded through the streets of Paris for having provoked, in a gazette article, the displeasure of the Bourbons' satellites. Here follows a catalogue of grievances no less leave the place by the 25th.
