GUILLAUME has the honor of informing the inhabitants of New-Orleans, that from Sunday next, March 11, he will in person superintend his house at the lake, where breakfasts and dinners will be served up, temporarily, until the general opening of his establishment, which will be published in all the papers of this city.

He hopes that public indulgence will be extended towards him; the more so, as the disappointments of last year were entirely beyond his control—the house not having been finished before the season was over. He hopes that public patronage will remunerate him for all trouble, which he may incur in the zealous discharge of his duties. He hopes that those whom he had informed that his house would have been opened on the 1st of March, will excuse him for a none compliance with his promise; the house then being unfit for reception. Nothing will be overlooked which may render the establishment both useful and agreeable.
