The War in Europe.

COMMENTS OF THE AMERICAN PRESS.

The Baltimore Gazette says:

If the causes which have led France to declare war seem in no way sufficient to justify it, Prussia at least has small cause for complaint. Her aggressions on her neighbors of late years have been justified by pleas even less tangible than those by which France now defends her course. The conquests at Sadowa and the invaders of Schleswig-Holstein can say but little concerning the lightness of the pretexts under which France marches an army into Luxemburg.

THE RIOT AT BRUSSELS.

[From the New York Journal of Commerce, July 15.]

Some of the European questions have been of late very knotty enough. There was the Schleswig-Holstein question, of which few men in Europe understood it; that question, we say, that only two men in Europe understood, and they never could understand it; that question, we say, that had to be half forgotten in the interest of peace, although that knock-me-down, the Great Exhibition itself, never settled it. But the Isle of Dogs, the Franco-Prussian Boundary question, and the Luxemburg question, all were nothing. But the Isle of Dogs, Franco-Prussian Boundary, and Luxemburg questions, Punch and some of the comic newspapers say, have been settled, nobody knows how much of Spanish public opinion or the will of the Cortes have been at the bottom of the settlement, but all journals of the Continent, and even the Queen of Spain herself, have declared that the Hohenzollern branches, to take the throne of Spain, Prince Leopold, has withdrawn his candidature on personal grounds, and it is generally believed to have the support of the great chief of Bismarck, King William of Prussia. Bismarck usually has his own way in the arrangement, should he could become King of Spain; but Leopold would be spoiled for special service to
