The point in dispute has been whether the biennial reductions of duty, by tenths of the excess over twenty percent, are to be calculated on the market value, or on the statutory value by minimums. If on the statutory value, the duty bring twenty-five per cent upon the arbitrary value of thirty-five cents the yard affixed to all cottons custing less them that amount—the biennial deductions must be made affix on the excess, or five per cent only, leaving at the end of nine years a protection of twesty percent nonning ally, but in fact, of sixty to eighty per cent and valorem, on the market value of coarse cottons. The other opinion has been that the minimums are abolished in rating the reductions of the excess over twenty per cent ad valorem.
