Napoleon's Life of Cæsar.

The second volume is the most remarkable in the study of the literary history of Napoleon. In the first volume of the work we have the materials which have already served to form the judgment of the world, and of which there is only record left. But the second volume is historical, for it contains the letters which will forever mark the character of the writer. We are thereby let into the secret of Napoleon's motives, and see the springs of action which have governed the world. Of course, in the progress of such a work, there is much that is interesting to each class of readers. Some will be attracted by the military details, others by the political, others by the personal. Some will delight in the literary criticisms, and others in the historical. But, on the whole, the most interesting portion of the work is that which relates to the Egyptian campaign, and the letters which were written during the first years of the Consulate. The letters to Josephine are full of tenderness, and show the deep affection which existed between them. Those to Joseph, Lucien, Louis, and Jerome, are characteristic of the writer, and show how much he was the master spirit of his family. Those to Talleyrand, Fouché, Cambacérès, Lebrun, and Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely, are models of diplomatic correspondence. Those to Carnot, Berthier, Marmont, Soult, Ney, Lannes, Augereau, Bernadotte, Davout, Masséna, Oudinot, Suchet, Gouvion St. Cyr, Macdonald, Moncey, Mortier, and Kellermann, are full of military instruction. Those to Eugène de Beauharnais, Murat, Prince Jerome, Prince Louis, Prince Joseph, Cardinal Fesch, Madame Mère, Queen Hortense, Princess Pauline, Princess Caroline, Princess Elisa, and Princess Julie, are full of family affection. Those to Talma, Corneille, Lemercier, Arnault, Fontanes, Chénier, Ducis, Andrieux, Boufflers, Florian, Parny, Legouvé, Delille, Esménard, Baour-Lormian, Michaud, Arnault, Jouy, Etienne, Lacretelle, Ségur, Chateaubriand, Lamartine, Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas, Casimir Delavigne, Scribe, Auber, Méhul, Grétry, Cherubini, Lesueur, Boieldieu, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Paër, Spontini, Isabey, Gérard, Gros, Girodet, Prud'hon, Horace Vernet, Ingres, Talma, Mlle.
