Davis suivit sir Richard. Son instinct de bon limier lui disait qu'il ferait bien de s'attacher aux pas de l'autre; mais les ordres que je lui avais donnés lui prescrivaient de ne pas quitter sir Richard. Le baronnet ne sortit pas de sa chambre toute la journée suivante, et Davis s'en alla tranquillement se promener au Trou-Perdu et s'y cacha dans les arbres de façon à avoir bien les fenêtres en vue. Il fit deux découvertes: la première, que mademoiselle Hernecastle était toujours là, et la seconde, qu'elle et la vieille cachaient un prisonnier.

Il y avait, à un bout de la chambre, une vieille armoire à linge avec une petite devanture vitrée couverte à l'intérieur d'un rideau de mousseline. Davis s'y logea à tous risques. Sir Richard entra accompagné de Dantree. Le baronnet s'assit en tournant le dos à l'armoire, tandis que Dantree se plaça droit en face. Davis fut frappé de nouveau en le voyant et se demandait où il l'avait déjà vu. En tout cas, il ne perdit rien de vue et entendait tout ce qu'on disait.

dont la figure était livide et qui tremblait de colère. Rappelez-vous, Dantree, que vous reviez de ce soir. Il faut que je regagne ce que j'ai perdu ou que je double ma perte. Dantree salua en souriant d'un air doux. Je serai trop heureux de vous offrir votre revanche, sir Richard. Je reviendrai ce soir, sans faute. Sir Richard le conduisit jusqu'à la porte. Davis profita de l'occasion pour sortir de sa cachette, à moitié asphyxié qu'il était par le manque d'air et à demi-mort par le besoin de sommeil. Mais avant de dormir ou de se reposer, il était nécessaire qu'il essayât de faire quelque nouvelle découverte sur l'heureux Dantree. Il le suivit jusqu'à sa résidence. Cette résidence était le Trou-Perdu! Et quand Davis l'y regarda entrer, toute la vérité lui apparut tout à coup. Gaston Dantree et Hélène Hernecastle n'étaient qu'une seule et même personne.
