The Journal du Havre of Saurday has the following article.

An extensive promotion was to have taken place in the nary on the last of January next, but the king has manifested the desire not to sign the promotions unless a war with the United States should, arise to give a greater degree of interest to the measure.

ed its midiation to France, in the differences between that country and the United States. A have now, however, strong reasons for believing, that Lord Granville simply offered the good offices of England, without proposing an official and direct mediation. The French papers, therefore, which state that the Duc de Broglier elused the mediation of England, do not know what they are writing about, and are quite in erpor. Besides, before England could interfere, it would be necessary for America to consect to it as well as france. England is too wise to interfere officially in this business, and run the risk of being rejected by General Luckson. Is it for France to propuse this mediation to the United States? If she proposes such a thing, would it not have the appearance of wishing to prevent a war, of which she was afraid? It appears to the that the mediator ought to offer a mediation to both parties. It would be a fine part for England to play, and no doub she will perform it. It would be another link joinet to the chain, which already unites these two great nations.

The court will, we understand, proceed with the docket this day.

The news from France is important; but there is yet no need of raising a war-cry. The measures of that country are of mere precaution, and no necessity as yet appears for a rupture. The example of gregaration, however; which it has set, we should immediately and strenuously follow, in order that we ma be ready for the worst. If the maxim to prepare for war in time of perfect peace be one of true policy, it becomes doubly so when the good understanding between two nations has been interrupted so far as to warrant at least the apprehension of timediate heatilities.
