The motion was adopted.

Mr Moore presented a bill to amend the act of 1835, suppressing gambling licences and houses. The fines imposed by the former act are to be equally divided between informers and the Charity hospital; informers are to be competent witnesses; and all playing for bone, ivory or other fictitious representatives of money, are amenable to the penalties of the former act.

A discussion arose on the section allowing informers to be witnesses. Mr Hos disapproved off it as being contrary to the strict principles of morality; and introducing a system of espionage into our laws.

Mr Brownson believes that the practice exists in England, where it is attended with beneficial effects; and that it prevails in other states. An amanuple of is may be found in the laws of Congress—particularly in the act to prevent the importation of slaves, which privileges an informer to be a witness. There are certain cases when this privilege is indispensable for the attainment of justice, in rendering more efficient the administration of the laws.

The bill was passed.

Mr Lacoust called for the bill to extend the juriadic-ministration of the laves.
