We cannot, at this time, unndertaks to state with precision, what papers and books have been destroyed; since those which were saved have not yet been all perfectly arthose which were saved have not yet been all perfectly arranged. The Scerctary of the Treasury has taken measures to obtain a prompt and accurate report from the heads of the Burcaux to this subject. But we believe that very few papers have been lost that are of much importance to the government or to individuals, and that the great mass of the unest valuable books and papers have been saved.

The depositions we have taken, accompany this report; and also dramings of the treasury building, which will enable you more readily to compact the testimony of the witness.
